MG1SDCTAH101- PRINCIPLES OF MANAGEMENT AND ORGANIZATIONAL BEHAVIOUR

NOVEMBER 2025

PART A

1. How does management help in increasing efficiency within an organization?

Management improves efficiency by planning work systematically and allocating resources properly. It ensures that employees perform tasks in the best possible way. Proper coordination and supervision reduce wastage of time and effort. As a result, overall productivity increases.

2. How can online recruitment help organizations?

Online recruitment helps organizations reach a larger pool of candidates quickly. It reduces the overall cost and time involved in hiring. The process becomes more transparent and easier to track. It also allows companies to screen candidates more effectively using digital tools.

3. State any two features of controlling.

Controlling is a continuous process that happens at all stages of management. It compares actual performance with planned targets. It also helps managers identify deviations and take corrective actions. This ensures that goals are achieved on time.

4. Why is planning called a primary function of management?

Planning is the primary function because it lays the foundation for all other managerial activities. It provides direction and prepares the organization for future challenges. Without planning, departments cannot coordinate their actions effectively. It ensures goals are clear and achievable.

5. What is directing?

Directing involves guiding and motivating employees to achieve organizational goals. It includes supervision, communication, leadership, and motivation. Through directing, managers influence workers' behavior positively. It ensures smooth flow of work and promotes teamwork.

6. How does promotion affect the staffing process?

Promotion fills higher-level positions internally, reducing the need for external recruitment. It motivates employees by rewarding good performance. It also enhances employee morale and loyalty. However, it may create further vacancies at lower levels that need to be filled.

7. Mention any two activities under staffing.

Staffing includes recruitment, where suitable candidates are attracted for jobs. It also involves selection, where candidates are evaluated and chosen for positions. Training and development are also important activities. These ensure employees perform their roles effectively.

8. Why is respect important in dealing with female colleagues?

Respect creates a safe and comfortable work environment for female colleagues. It promotes equality and professionalism in the workplace. Respectful behavior prevents harassment and misunderstandings. It also builds trust and improves teamwork.

9. How does organizing facilitate specialization?

Organizing divides work into smaller tasks and assigns them to people based on their skills. This allows employees to focus on specific duties they are good at. With continuous practice, they become experts in their roles. Specialization increases productivity and efficiency.

10. Mention any two types of motivation.

Intrinsic motivation, Extrinsic motivation, Positive motivation, Negative motivation.

PART B

13. List and explain the main steps in the organizing process.

The organizing process involves a series of steps that help management arrange resources and activities effectively. The first step is identifying and grouping activities according to organizational goals, such as production, finance, marketing, or HR. The second step is assigning these grouped activities to individuals or departments based on their skills and responsibilities. The third step involves delegating authority to managers and employees so they can perform the assigned tasks efficiently. The fourth step is establishing reporting relationships, which ensures a clear hierarchy and smooth communication. The final step is coordinating all departments and activities to ensure that work flows smoothly across the organization. These steps ensure clarity, accountability, and improved performance.

14. List and describe the five levels of needs in Maslow's theory.

Maslow's hierarchy of needs is a motivation theory that explains human needs in five levels. The first level is Physiological needs, which include basic necessities like food, water, shelter, and rest. The second level is Safety needs, referring to security, protection, and stability in one's environment. The third level is Social needs, which include friendship, love, and belongingness. The fourth level is Esteem needs, involving self-respect, recognition, and status. The highest level is Self-actualization, where a person seeks to achieve personal growth, creativity, and self-fulfillment. According to Maslow, people are motivated to satisfy lower-level needs first before moving to higher ones.

15. Explain the importance of planning in effective management.

Planning is essential in management because it provides a clear direction for organizational activities. It helps managers set goals and determine the best strategies to achieve them. Planning reduces uncertainty by forecasting future conditions and preparing for possible challenges. It also promotes optimum utilization of resources by eliminating unnecessary activities and preventing wastage. Planning improves coordination by aligning departmental goals with overall organizational objectives. It aids in decision-making by offering alternatives and evaluating the best course of action. Effective planning boosts employee motivation because workers understand their tasks clearly. Overall, planning leads to efficiency, productivity, and long-term success.

16. Explain the principle of Authority and Responsibility with suitable examples.

The principle of authority and responsibility states that managers must have the authority required to carry out their responsibilities effectively. Authority refers to the power to give orders, make decisions, and allocate resources. Responsibility is the obligation to perform assigned tasks and be accountable for results. The principle emphasizes that authority and responsibility must be equal and balanced, meaning a manager should not be given responsibility without adequate authority. For example, a sales manager responsible for achieving targets must also have the authority to design sales strategies and control sales operations. If authority exceeds responsibility, misuse of power may occur; if responsibility exceeds authority, performance suffers. This principle ensures smooth functioning and accountability within the organization.

17. What is meant by individual behaviour in an organization?

Individual behaviour in an organization refers to how a person behaves, responds, and interacts within the workplace. It is influenced by factors such as personality, attitudes, perception, learning, and motivation. Understanding individual behaviour helps managers predict employee reactions and improve work relationships. Positive behaviour leads to better teamwork, higher productivity, and a healthy work environment. Negative behaviour may result in conflicts, low morale, and reduced efficiency. Managers study individual behaviour to design policies that enhance job satisfaction and performance. It is a key element of organizational behaviour and helps in effective management of human resources.

18. Describe the concept of the 4P’s of Management and its significance in business operations.

The "4 Ps of management" most commonly refers to the 4 Ps of marketing: Product, Price, Place, and Promotion. However, the term can also refer to different sets of four "P"s depending on the management context, such as People, Product, Process, and Project for project management or Planning, Priority, Perspective, and Patience for general management principles.

The 4 Ps of Marketing

This is the most well-known set of 4 Ps and is a core concept for marketing strategy.

- Product: The good or service that a company offers to its customers.
- Price: The amount customers pay for the product.
- Place: Where and how the product is distributed and sold.
- Promotion: The communication strategies used to advertise the product.

Alternative "4 Ps"

Depending on the specific field of management, the term can have different meanings:

For Project Management

- People: The team, stakeholders, and everyone else involved in the project.
- Product: The tangible or intangible output that the project is delivering.

- Process: The workflows, methodologies, and governance used to execute the project.
- Project: The overall planning, budget, and timelines that define the scope.

PART C

19. Explain the concept of personality and discuss the key personality traits that influence organizational behaviour.

Personality refers to the unique and relatively stable pattern of thoughts, feelings, and behaviours that distinguish one individual from another. It develops over time through heredity, environment, culture, and life experiences. In organizations, personality plays a major role in shaping how employees interact, make decisions, handle stress, and perform their duties. Understanding personality helps managers predict employee behaviour and design strategies for motivation and teamwork.

One important personality trait is extroversion, which reflects how outgoing, energetic, and social a person is. Extroverts generally perform well in jobs requiring teamwork, communication, and leadership, while introverts excel in analytical or independent tasks.

Another major trait is agreeableness, which indicates how cooperative, friendly, and compassionate an employee is. Employees high in agreeableness contribute to a positive work climate and reduce conflicts.

Conscientiousness is also a key trait that describes how disciplined, organized, and reliable a person is. Highly conscientious employees show strong commitment, meet deadlines, and maintain quality, making them ideal for managerial and administrative roles. Emotional stability refers to a person's ability to remain calm, confident, and composed under pressure. Individuals high in this trait manage stress better and maintain productivity during challenging situations.

A very influential trait is openness to experience, which reflects creativity, curiosity, and willingness to accept new ideas. Employees who are high in openness contribute to innovation and support organizational change. Other personality dimensions such as locus of control, risk-taking tendency, self-esteem, and authoritarianism also significantly influence workplace behaviour.

In summary, personality determines how employees respond to situations, communicate with others, and contribute to organizational goals. Managers who understand personality differences can create better teams, delegate tasks more effectively, and improve job satisfaction. Therefore, personality is a critical factor in shaping organizational behaviour and overall performance.

20. Explain the meaning and features of formal and informal organizations. Discuss the differences between them and their significance in the smooth functioning of an organization.

A formal organization refers to the official, structured, and planned arrangement of roles, responsibilities, and authority within an organization. It is designed by management to achieve specific objectives and operates through established rules, procedures, and policies.

Its key features include a well–defined hierarchy, clear job descriptions, standard operating procedures, and documented communication channels. Formal organizations ensure discipline, coordination, and accountability among employees.
In contrast, an informal organization consists of social relationships and personal connections that naturally develop among employees. These relationships are not planned by management but arise from shared interests, values, and friendships. Its features include flexible communication, emotional support, shared norms, and informal leadership. Informal groups play an important role in shaping employee attitudes and work culture.
The major difference between the two is their structure: the formal organization is rigid and hierarchical, whereas the informal one is flexible and unstructured. Communication in formal organizations follows official channels, while informal communication is quick and spontaneous. In formal groups, leadership is assigned by management, whereas in informal groups, leaders emerge naturally based on popularity or competence. Formal organizations work toward organizational goals, while informal ones focus on personal and social needs.
Both systems are essential for smooth functioning. The formal structure ensures order, efficiency, and accountability, enabling the organization to achieve its goals. The informal organization supplements the formal system by promoting teamwork, cooperation, and employee satisfaction. It reduces workplace stress and increases motivation by providing emotional support and a sense of belonging. When both work in harmony, they create a productive, stable, and positive work environment.
Thus, both formal and informal organizations play complementary roles in enhancing overall organizational effectiveness.

21. Explain the three levels of management and discuss the roles and responsibilities of each level in achieving organizational goals.

Management in any organization is divided into three levels: top-level, middle-level, and lower-level. Each level performs specific roles and responsibilities that contribute to organizational success. These levels are arranged in a hierarchy based on authority, decision-making power, and scope of work.
The top-level management includes the board of directors, CEO, and senior executives. Their main role is to set organizational goals, define long-term strategies, and make major policy decisions. They are responsible for planning, resource allocation, and guiding the overall direction of the company. Top management also represents the organization to external stakeholders and ensures long-term growth and stability.
The middle-level management consists of departmental heads, managers, and division leaders. They act as a bridge between top management and lower-level employees. Their primary role is to implement policies and plans formulated at the top level. They coordinate departmental activities, allocate resources, and supervise lower-level managers. They also motivate employees, resolve departmental conflicts, and ensure that goals are achieved within time and budget.
The lower-level management includes supervisors, foremen, and team leaders. Their main responsibility is to oversee day-to-day operations and directly manage workers. They assign tasks, maintain work schedules, ensure quality of output, and provide training to employees. They also communicate employee problems to higher levels and maintain discipline on the shop floor.
All three levels of management contribute significantly to organizational goals. Top management provides vision, middle management ensures coordination, and lower management ensures efficient execution. Together, they create a structured, efficient, and well-functioning organization.

Thus, understanding the roles of each management level is essential for achieving productivity, growth, and long-term success.
