Part C

17. Difference between tourism products and general consumer products .

Tourism products are intangible experiences such as travel, accommodation, and sightseeing that cannot be stored or owned, while general consumer products are tangible goods that can be produced, stored, and physically possessed.

Tourism products depend on service quality and destination appeal, whereas consumer products depend on material quality and price.

18. Potential of India’s diverse resources in positioning India as a global tourism hub .

India’s diversity—ranging from natural landscapes (Himalayas, deserts, beaches) to cultural heritage (monuments, festivals, cuisines)—offers varied experiences for tourists worldwide.

Its rich traditions, wildlife, spirituality, and modern facilities make India a multi-dimensional destination, attracting international travellers.

19. Essay on SIT (Special Interest Tourism) and its importance in sustainable development .

Special Interest Tourism (SIT) refers to travel motivated by a particular passion or purpose, such as adventure, eco-tourism, wellness, heritage, or culinary exploration. Unlike mass tourism, SIT focuses on smaller groups and personalized experiences, allowing deeper interaction with local culture and environment.

SIT plays a vital role in sustainable development by reducing over-tourism in crowded destinations and promoting lesser-known regions. It encourages community participation, protects natural and cultural resources, and supports local economies through responsible travel. For example, eco-tourism in national parks or cultural tourism in rural areas helps preserve traditions while providing livelihoods.
